"Home Alone",
July 16, 2007

The cover story is thought provoking. The old deserve financial and familial attention in recognition of their contribution during the productive years.

Future Tense

Young professionals seem to be devoting too much of attention to work ("Home Alone", July 16). What they don't realise is that they are rushing into the future and neglecting their present, the repercussions of which will be seen much later.

In countries like Japan and China, annual appraisal of an employee depends on how one takes care of his/her parents. The required data is collected without the knowledge of the employee in collaboration with the parents. The private sector in India should adopt such measures to ensure workable relationship between the old and the young.

It is disheartening to read about the agonising life of senior citizens in India.

Time is not far away when the last rites of the deceased will be performed without the attendance of their children.

CHANDER BHAT, on e-mail

It is not fair to blame the younger generation alone. The old should own up equal responsibility to bridge the gap between them and their children. Both generations should give each other space and independence. They are key to a healthy relationship.

MAN MOHAN BHATIA, Delhi

Youngsters will realise and repent only when they will be disowned and discarded by their own children in the future. In their pursuit of acquiring wealth in today's booming economy, they should not forget those who gave them birth. They should be scared of natural justice.

K. CHIDANAND KUMAR, Bangalore

The old feeling isolated is too frivolous a topic for a cover story. It didn't deserve such a mammoth display. While so much is happening in and around India, INDIA TODAY could have chosen something more contemporary as its main story.

R.SINGH, Delhi

Although a poignant article, the cover story did not deal with the true sandwich generation. With some senior citizens suffering at the hands of the younger lot, it is unfair to club everyone in one single category. Just like no two children can be compared, two adults too can't be equated.

General Unrest

General Pervez Musharraf may have demonstrated his commitment to fight back radical Islamism and the resurgent neo-Taliban

("Taking on the Mullahs", July 16). However, what he doesn't understand is that he may have just provoked many more such revolts around the country.

J. AKSHAY, Secunderabad

The year 2007 hasn't proved lucky for Musharraf. First, he suffered setbacks from the judiciary for suspending Pakistan's Chief Justice. And now he is pitted against another powerful political class: the mullahs. This is just a premonition of what is to come in the forthcoming elections.

Wonder Full

Taj Mahal has retained its status in the Seven Wonders of the World ("A Vote of Love", July 16). Without doubt, Taj is a symbol of love, as the number of votes it garnered to be a wonder stand testimony to the people's love for it. A part
