

At Home With Luxury

From classic art on the walls and environmentally sustainable living spaces to personalised interiors, the affluent Indian is leaving no stone unturned to make a home that can uplift more than his social status

A ASHNA KHURANA is lounging in her living room when we arrive to see the K Villa, designed by architectural firm PSA Interiors and furnished by Design Consultant Heena Handa of EDC Space. A little later, we step out to go to the finely manicured lawn. Aashna walks barefoot from a plush drawing room through a large French door that brings in the verdant views of the lush green outside. We pass by the Buddha sculptures on the way to an animal pen where her five-year-old can play with goats, cows, chickens and ducks. The property has over 5,000 trees and plants and a two-acre food 'forest' where they grow fruits and vegetables such as guava, custard apple, oranges and kinu. The Miyawaki-inspired free-flowing forest surrounds the house, branches bowing gracefully into the lake.

For Aashna and her husband Bhisham Chawla, who moved into this eight-acre farmhouse near Vasant Kunj, not too far from the heart of the city, a couple of years ago, this grounding in nature is vital for their daughter's well-being. The other properties in this quiet neighbourhood are similarly laid out. Before shifting to this property, the couple and their child lived in an equally well-appointed villa at the 270-acre Karma Lakelands, a golf resort developed by Aashna's father, an avid proponent of sustainable lifestyles. Aashna, Bhisham and their daughter spend weekends there. They are planning to launch the next phase of the project. Aashna, a trained interior designer, is in her element when doing up homes while her husband worries
