

1

2

1. NEESH PERFUMES

This home-grown brand blends tradition with craftsmanship

2. BOOND FRAGRANCES

The luxury attar label from Kannauj makes handcrafted attars

This underpenetration is also India's biggest advantage. Consumers are moving from occasional to daily use, experimenting with layering, collecting multiple scents, and participating in experiential journeys such as "scent rooms" and perfumer masterclasses. Prestige and luxury dominate growth, while niche labels are fast emerging as the new frontier.

At Tira's flagship in Mumbai's Jio World Plaza, niche houses like Diptyque have already sparked strong consumer interest. The retailer is now expanding its portfolio with names such as Comme des Garçons and Amouage—brands once reserved for select global capitals, are now within reach of Indian buyers.

"The adoption curve has accelerated dramatically. Consumers are valuing fragrance as an integral part of self-expression and are willing to invest in luxury much earlier in their journey," says Bahety.

For global brands, the message is clear: India is not yet saturated, but it is swiftly maturing. The country is no longer just a market for consumption but a trendsetter in the making. With its heritage of attars, its growing appetite for experimentation, and its aspiration-driven buyers, India could well define the next chapter in the global fragrance story. BT

@PalakAgarwal64, @AASTHACHOPRA13