Twilight on a Garment

IMAGINE FABRIC CREATED with threads that carry cultural memory. A garment that celebrates and honours several timeless craft traditions, dyed with organic, natural, indestructible colour that lives in the weave. In the age of excess, the 11.11 reversible Indigo kantha patchwork jacket created by Shani Himanshu and Mia Morikawa is fashion reimagined as meditative luxury—slow, sustainable, rooted, and deeply human. What appear as patches are fabrics that represent the best of Indian craftsmanship—handwoven khadi and spun denim made from indigenous cotton, deft and fine bandhini tie-and-dye work, and Ajrakh block prints are seamlessly fused using the kintsugi of intricate kantha stitches. Priced at ₹1.1 lakh, the bespoke, limited-edition garment takes 120 days to create from weave to finish. It is then dyed in various shades of organic Indigo in a resurrected cold dyeing process. The blue hues broken by clouds of white bandhini patterns on a modern gender-fluid silhouette create the radiance of a deep evening sky. What you wear is an heirloom of culture and conscience.
