

CB: How do people spend on luxury cars? Do buyers spend more on interiors, colours, technology, or customisation? Are younger buyers more experimental compared to older ones who stick to classic styles?

SI: Two things. Number one, the biggest purchasing factor is always styling. The exterior styling of the car has the first impact on a customer's decision. But then, at the top end of the segment, it is all about personalisation. Can I individualise the car? Can I personalise it to what I want? Maybe my G 63 should be as individual as anybody else's G 63. Customisation is a big trend.

When it comes to entry-level luxury or even the core luxury segment, most of the products that we offer are standardised. But there, as I said, it is about experiences, and the overall customer support that we can offer. I think all this plays a major role in decision-making in India.

CB: What kind of customisations do you offer?

SI: We offer customisation in terms of colour, paint options, and interiors. The second is upholstery. Then it is about merging all these. We go to customers' residences

“The consumer side might be a little weaker but there are a lot of other segments of the economy which are doing very well” and show them personalisation options, both online and offline, between different colours and fabrics. Plus, we offer individualisation.

For example, we just did this G-Wagon wherein every car will have the family name or personal name of the customer etched into the grab handle. We can go to any extent to take care of the customer's needs.

CB: Who are the buyers of high-end cars, ₹1-1.5 crore and above? Are they self-made entrepreneurs, young achievers, or established families? What pushes them to buy: status, exclusivity, or personal enjoyment?

SI: As I said, we have two sets of customers. A luxury dweller, for whom buying a luxury car is a state of mind.
