difficult to achieve in a luxury context.”

The Fairmont Udaipur Palace, managed by Accor, is the third Fairmont in India, coming on the heels of Jaipur (2012) and the 446-room Fairmont Mumbai, which opened around the same time.

The launch of two Fairmonts in quick succession is a turning point in India’s luxury hospitality industry—the beginning of a nationwide boom driven by wealth creation, domestic demand, lifestyle shifts, and the ₹10 lakh crore wedding economy.

For decades, India’s luxury hotel market was dominated by palace conversions and a handful of urban flagships. The Taj group (Indian Hotels Company Ltd), Oberoi Hotels & Resorts (EIH Ltd.), ITC Hotels, and The Leela Palaces, Hotels and Resorts created a small but iconic portfolio, appealing to both foreign tourists and India’s elite.

International brands arrived cautiously. Marriott, Accor, Hilton, and Hyatt tested the waters with select properties in Bengaluru, Mumbai, and Delhi, but spent much of the past two decades building scale in budget and premium segments.

However, that is changing fast.

As of June, India had 35,000 branded luxury hotel keys across more than 200 properties. By 2030, the country is expected to add more than 20,300 rooms, according to HVS ANAROCK, a hospitality industry consultant.

The commitments are aggressive. Marriott International is planning 33 new luxury hotels across JW Marriott, Ritz-Carlton, St. Regis, W, and Luxury Collection, more than doubling its existing footprint of 31.

Besides the Fairmonts in Udaipur and Mumbai, Accor is preparing landmark projects such as Raffles
