The luxury businesses of the Tata Group, the Aditya Birla Group (ABG), and the Reliance Industries are remarkably different. The critical question is the extent of synergy with the existing portfolio. Abhay Gupta, Founder & CEO, Luxury Connect Business School, cites the case of the Tata group, where the "play is on heritage and trust" and how that syncs well with businesses like Taj Hotels, Tanishq, and Jaguar Land Rover. "They have a very long-term approach, and the trust factor helps in having a presence across every possible sector that exists in luxury," he says.

A key part of the ABG's luxury foray is The Collective, a multi-brand retail concept. Given its long association with fashion and retail (the buyout of Madura Garments in 1999 gave it a big presence in apparel), there is a robust distribution network. "They have a very good understanding of the business and are well-positioned to get a healthy share of the consumer who is moving up," explains Gupta. Investing in Indian names like Masaba Gupta, Tarun Tahiliani, Shantnu & Nikhil has aided the process of getting the best out of its distribution network. "The opportunity lies in a large part of premium fashion being fragmented. The group wants to formalise that market." To spread its luxury brand, Aditya Birla Fashion & Retail has entered a strategic partnership with France's Galeries Lafayette to open luxury department stores in India.

Reliance Industries, the largest Indian company, made a big move by acquiring Genesis Colors, the company that then distributed brands
