At a time when India's growth has seen unprecedented consumer spending, for companies, it is an unmissable story. Take the case of luxury jewellery.

According to Sandeep Kohli, CEO (Indriya), Aditya Birla Jewellery, the market is projected to reach $11.6 billion by 2025 and expand at a compound annual growth rate of 6.4% through 2030. "It is fuelled by rising disposable incomes, a growing affluent consumer base and a cultural affinity for gold and diamond jewellery, particularly in weddings," he says. Launched last year, Indriya (meaning five senses in Sanskrit), while being a jeweller for all occasions, has a strong focus on bridal jewellery. "Beyond just the numbers, what excites us is the market's transformative spirit. It is one where tradition and modernity converge," says Kohli, for whom jewellery is not just bought but cherished "as an enduring expression of identity, heritage, and a love for it."

The approach to luxury is vastly different from that of other sectors. A lot of time goes into understanding consumer insights and then getting it right on the product offering. "It's not solely about large investments but more about creating the right levels of quality, aspiration, and trust," says Bain's Mathur. Emphasising how homegrown brands have performed well in categories deeply rooted in Indian culture, he outlines examples such as jewellery, weddings, and hospitality. "This is by delivering relevant products, highly personalised service, and customisation suited specifically to Indian tastes and preferences. More recently, brand
