the series gave those brands a leg up.

Succession's characters, especially Shiv Roy (played by Sarah Snook) and Naomi Pierce (played by Annabelle Dexter-Jones), wear luxury quietly with supreme perfection. They dress in a simple, tailored style without being flashy. Their wardrobes were typically made up of neutral-coloured, preppy pieces like suits, turtlenecks, and knit frocks. They dressed right for every occasion, emphasising quality and comfort in neutral tones. One of the few exceptions through the show's four seasons was when the character Connor refuses to check his coat at the door of Ken's birthday party because "I don't trust those things. I lost a 'Norwegian Wool' in a fusion restaurant in Vancouver," he said.

That casual mention sparked a run on Norwegian Wool to find out why it's a brand that Connor covets. The New York Times called it "the coat to wear to Davos".

WHAT IS QUIET LUXURY?

Quiet luxury emphasises refined consumption and understated elegance. It's also known as stealth wealth, old money aesthetic, or silent luxury. This subdued yet premium mode of dressing is leaving its mark on popular culture.

At its core, it is a resurgent fashion movement that emphasises investment in high-quality, minimalist pieces that have timeless appeal. In short, it describes those labels that offer products in sublime cuts and fabrics and which shun big flashy corporate logos and headline-grabbing fashion statements to encourage a sense of discovery instead. This is 'anti-bling'—the other end of the scale to popular avant-garde designer brands that experiment with bold logos and ostentatious patterns.

Today, the minimalist aesthetic that has been dominating the runways the last couple of years is all about less is more. It continues to take the fashion industry by storm and is most prominent in men's brands like The Row, Brioni, and Zegna. When you think of these brands, think simple but thoughtful silhouettes, timeless styles that defy trends, and neutrals and muted colours.

The quiet luxury convert is less concerned about projecting wealth than creating a wardrobe full of high-end everyday staples that speak to a more sophisticated understanding of style. It's likely to go unnoticed by the untrained eye. Think neutral colours, smart tailoring, clean-cut lines, and elite craftsmanship. Think logo-less Loro Piana baseball caps, Brunello Cucinelli cashmere sweaters, and practically everything from The Row.

The women's wear in this space is also very popular, purely because classics are back and it is all about neu-
