Much of the momentum behind this resurgence can be attributed to GenZ, which yearns for authenticity trials and naturals. It all started when women realised they needed fewer clothes during the pandemic and moved more towards comfort. It was Back to Basics; it became all about styling—a simple black dress with cool accessories or a beige woollen dress with sleek black boots. That's where brands like Celine, Loewe, Max Mara, Jil Sander, Issey Miyake, and Sandro became the highlights of quiet luxury in women's wear.

The focus has moved to investment pieces and thoughtful shopping. That's why the Hermès Birkin bag is one of the most desired women's bags today. Described as practical, stylish, and highly desirable, it has been an icon of the fashion world since it first appeared in 1984. Inspired by the legend of French cinema and song, Jane Birkin, this tote bag is among the most sought-after bags. A Birkin can easily range from $10,000 to $2 million, and even if you are ready to pay all this money, you are still in a queue extending over a couple of years.

This concept is pretty nascent in the Indian market, which has been mainly driven by 'logo luxury', but it's catching on. Says Ritesh Kumar of DS Luxury Retail, which has brought top-end men's brands like Tom Ford, Brioni, Brunello Cucinelli, etc. to India, "Our brand curation is inspired by the evolving desires of the modern Indian consumer, particularly highlighted in the May 2024 DBS report, which notes the luxury industry's growth is driven by younger consumers seeking unique
