“Brand persona should define the core”

What was the problem you were grappling with?

I'd say this was a strategic pivot. We had an iconic brand, but had, over time, evolved into diversified lines of businesses that could no longer be represented within the confines of our 'name'.

In keeping with the needs of our target customers and stakeholders, we took a strategic call to reinvent ourselves with a new identity that would encapsulate the company's aspirations.

Whom did you approach for advice and why?

I wanted to ensure that the new identity would beckon the future, but at the same time imbibe our legacy values. To do so, we decided to take a science-based approach and leverage the expertise of a professional brand consultant.

We engaged with the gamut of our stakeholders through market research tools. We used proprietary brand tools and models to define our brand persona, brand name, and brand line.

What was the advice you received?

The brand 'persona' approach helped us define the brand core. We identified three personas for our new brand positioning: agility, security, and equitable empowerment. While trust and security were established brand values, the stakeholders associated immense weight with agility and speed of transformation.

These personas converged into our new name 'Protean', synonymous with versatility, adaptability, resourcefulness, and malleability. The new name was complemented by a vibrant, ever-changing kaleidoscope pattern with the letter P.

How effective was it in resolving the problem?

These efforts propelled a significant mindset shift. As an organisation we have pivoted from being a systemically important system integrator into an agile product organisation. BT
