tions and technology,” says Anita Khatri, a Delhi-based watch connoisseur and collector. During the Covid-19 pandemic, she started India’s first watch collector’s club for women to educate them about different watches and brands.

“I remember going to the Breitling stall in Basel, Switzerland, a decade ago and asking them when they would introduce watches for women, and they just said that women were welcome to wear what was available; fast forward to today, and they have collections for women,” says Khatri, who also works with several watch brands. Over the past few years, Breitling has launched several collections for women, including the Endurance, Superocean, Chronomat Victoria Beckham, and Navitimer.

At Bvlgari, the Serpenti collection remains one of the biggest contributors to the company’s sales, says a spokesperson. The latest addition is the Serpenti Pallini, a high-jewellery watch where the bracelet is composed of several small gold beads or diamonds, each individually set on a gold mesh, a technique developed in 18th-century Paris.

Women’s watches dominated the Watches and Wonders trade show in Geneva earlier this year. Hermès introduced its first women’s sport watch, “The Cut,” Chanel launched a new women’s capsule collection integrating symbols from its haute couture history, and Cartier continued its streak with a new cuff watch, “Reflection de Cartier”. designer Yiqing Yin, where the watch bracelet is infused with a custom perfume. Montblanc has also introduced new watches for women in its Bohème collection with 30 mm and 34 mm dials.

Chopard launched a new blue edition of its Happy Sport collection that was first released in 1993, when Caroline Scheufele, the Co-president of Chopard, was still a young designer at her family’s watchmaking business. At that time, she realised that Chopard did not make the kind of sporty watches for women that she wanted to wear. The Happy Sport was the first time diamonds were put into a steel watch, with Chopard’s sig-
