

Will she? Will she not?... I pluck the petals of an imaginary flower as I walk down Pennsylvania Avenue in Washington, DC, and make my way towards the most famous residential address in the world—the White House—the official residence of the President of the US. Kamala Harris, often referred to as the ‘childless cat lady’ and the Democratic presidential candidate, is on my mind. Will she be the next US President? The world is holding its breath.

It’s election season in the US, and nowhere is it felt more acutely than in the country’s capital city of Washington, DC. “Fight! Fight! Fight!” screams a T-shirt with a picture of Republican candidate Donald Trump, hanging at a souvenir cart, alongside one promoting Kamala Harris for President. The cart is owned by an East Asian woman, who doesn’t say much except ‘dollar’ while signalling you to pay up. I ask her who she will vote for. “No voting,” she says unsmilingly. I then inquire about what sells the most. She points to a $15 Trump bobblehead. I feel tempted, but instead buy a Harris T-shirt. Whether
