

ART OF COOKING For Sanghvi, there are parallels between cooking and entrepreneurship. Both require confidence and the willingness to push boundaries cook every Sunday and try to do something different every weekend,” he shares.

Whether it’s grinding a tangy sauce with fresh red poblano peppers or crafting an eight-layer vegetarian biryani, Darpan’s kitchen is a place for innovation. His culinary creations are as unexpected as they are delightful. It’s this element of surprise, this constant push to do something new that mirrors his approach to business.

PARALLEL PURSUITS

For Sanghvi, the parallels between cooking and entrepreneurship are clear. Both require confidence, creativity, and a willingness to push boundaries. “Cooking, like entrepreneurship, is about trying new things and pushing boundaries,” he says. Just as in business, the ultimate satisfaction in cooking comes from the appreciation from the consumer—which, in this case, is his family. That moment when they take a bite and give that contented sigh is, for Sanghvi, akin to hitting a milestone in his business.

In the corporate world, the lines between work and personal life are increasingly getting blurred. For entrepreneurs like Sanghvi, who are ‘always on,’ achieving a work-life balance can seem elusive. However, he acknowledges the importance of creating that balance for his team, even if it’s challenging for him personally. “One cannot expect your team to be as driven as the entrepreneur,” he notes. “It’s essential to invest in creating the right culture and work-life balance for your team.”

BOUNDARIES THAT MATTER

While Sanghvi may blur the lines between work and home by using his business experiences to educate and motivate his daughters, he is careful to keep his work stress separate from his home life. “The boundary that I maintain is to not share the stress I have at work, in my home,” he says. Yet, he cherishes the moments when he can cook up dinner table stories that inspire his daughters, blending his professional insights with personal life lessons.

For Darpan Sanghvi, cooking is more than just a hobby—it’s a creative endeavour and a metaphor for leadership. Whether in the boardroom or the kitchen, Sanghvi always strives to create something exceptional. And in doing so, he not only nourishes his family but also fuels his own journey as an entrepreneur. BT
