

to have an impact on India. We are in a world today where everyone is thinking purely in terms of their self-interest...

As far as India is concerned, we're going to keep doing what's been done in the past few years... under the Trump administration, we have to be prepared for very transactional approaches, where he may sort of decide tomorrow if he has to strike a deal with some country because it's in America's interest at that point in time, he's not going to care about how India's going to feel as a strategic ally.

Q: How do you see the outlook for the Indian markets in the medium and short terms?

A: The problem that's happened around the world is that the past 15 years, the post-global financial crisis world, from a financial perspective, has been entirely dominated by the US. If you look at America today, its economic size in the global economy is about 28%. But if you look at the stock market indices around the

“The big challenge that India and other emerging markets are facing is that there is zero interest in international [markets] in America today, from an investing perspective”

world, America is now approaching 65%. It's been so for the past 10-15 years where America has totally dominated as a financial superpower. Because a lot of US investors and others feel that if they have to get global exposure, they might as well buy the Microsofts and Googles... I think the big challenge that India