Seksaria outlines how TCS has stayed ahead by “deploying cutting-edge indigenous solutions”.

It is a period of constant change at TCS, in line with a dynamic business scenario, as it is with any of the Tata group companies. At the turn of the century, it bought over Tetley, the first overseas acquisition, followed by others, and reaching a peak with Tata Steel’s $12-billion deal to buy Corus. Soon after, Tata Motors picked up the iconic Jaguar Land Rover (JLR) from Ford.

The group saw strategic advantages in going global, but every business of the Tata group is tuned into the Indian perspective, says Deven R. Choksey, Chairman and MD of investment advisory firm DRChoksey Finserv. The group is looking to attract global skills, technology, and financial resources. “With a quality asset and a good culture, it makes for a unique combination,” says Choksey.

TCS is a prime example of that approach. For a company that took advantage of labour arbitrage in the past, Seksaria now highlights innovation as its hedge against technology-led disruption cycles. “Our emphasis on investing to develop cutting-edge capabilities and industrialise this and training our talent at scale to work in these areas have been instrumental in achieving growth and profitability.”

LARGE BUT NIMBLE

One standout feature of the Tata group companies is their ability to adapt to the times. P.B. Balaji, Group CFO of Tata Motors, says the decision to have distinct strategies for the company’s verticals was a result of that approach. “It has been about winning decisively in commercial vehicles, winning sustainably in passenger vehicles, and winning distinctively in JLR,” Balaji explains.

In the case of passenger vehicles, the turnaround came with the pivot to meet the evolving demand for sports utility vehicles (SUVs). “Today’s portfolio was built from new products to enhance the addressable market, make smart product interventions, and refresh designs and features in a timely manner,” points out Balaji.

The distinct strategy is perhaps
