

DINESH KUMAR KHARA
Former Chairman, State Bank of India

KALPANA MORPARIA
Former Chairman, J.P. Morgan, South & Southeast Asia

portfolio is relatively less risky. What we should do in these good times is watch out for risks building in what we consider a literally risk-free portfolio.

▶▶▶

Which is what the RBI seems to be doing...

Garg: Exactly. The regulators are taking note, and I think we would be doing much better if you want to guard our banking system on a sustainable, strong growth path for longer to see these spaces: the personal space, the MSME space, and the services space.

▶▶▶

In a growing economy like India, people have ambitions; they have aspirations, but so do fraudsters. Are more checks and balances needed to curb fraud?

Sinha: It is a continuous process, and we in fact had a series of hearings when I was chairing the finance committee on cybersecurity and online fraud. We identified a number of gaps, many of which have been closed. That being said, a lot of people who are not tech-savvy are continuously being hounded and shown attractive offers, and they could lose money. There is also hacking. So, it is a continuous process. The bad guys are out there. The government is taking action, but it is also very important for customers to be aware of online fraud.

▶▶▶

Over the past 10 years, we have seen near-complete proliferation of Aadhaar, PAN, and other databases. We have heard about leaks as well. Is more specific action needed?

Khara: I would only like to add further that when it comes to this kind of risk, technology has brought in a whole lot of convenience, but with that there is this whole problem of cybersecurity also. I think it requires continuous investment in technology. As far as the ecosystem is concerned, security is not limited to the bank level; it is at a network level also.

▶▶▶

In the recent past, we have seen RBI come down heavily on certain NBFCs. But from your perspective, are